

Chapter 25: Social Responsibility

Our life's work in raising children has centered around developing a sense of social responsibility in them. This is accomplished by developing the child's natural abilities. Nurtured abilities build self-esteem, both which are desperately needed to start on a road to survival. As children grow, this process helps them become responsible for their own well-being and eventually strong enough to do their part, in return, for their community. We strive to change the world one child at a time by raising social warriors who are not easily conquered by external pressure or vices.
